

Editorial

Welcome to Volume 3 of the ATLAANZ Journal (2018), a four-part special issue entitled “Tertiary Learning Advisors on Aotearoa/New Zealand: Identity and Opportunity”, that presents a comprehensive research project undertaken by Caitriona Cameron (HoD: Academic and Career Skills, Library Teaching and Learning at Lincoln University) and founding member, former President (2009-2010) and Executive Committee member of the Association of Tertiary Learning Advisors Aotearoa/New Zealand.

Caitriona’s project, canvassing learning advisors’ perceptions of their professional status and career opportunities within the New Zealand higher education context, complements both her previous research¹ and Carolyn Malkin and Kate Chanock’s recent paper on the state of the profession in Australia².

The special issue comprises a series of inter-connected articles, designed to be read together and in order:

- Part One: Building a profile of our profession presents the demographics (age, gender, ethnicity, qualifications) of the 106 tertiary learning advisors (TLAs) from New Zealand universities, polytechnics and wānanga who responded to a 2014 survey distributed via the ATLAANZ members’ mailing list.
- Part Two: Acknowledging our contribution looks at institutional recognition (or lack thereof) of TLAs, in terms of respondents’ employment agreements (‘academic’, ‘general’ or ‘other’), salary scales, career pathways, and engagement in research activity.
- Part Three: Why do we stay? Rewards and challenges considers job satisfaction and factors motivating respondents to remain in the role – or to leave. Findings highlight a strong collective sense of social responsibility and collegiality, but Cameron challenges TLAs to do more to make institution-wide contributions to the Scholarship of Teaching and Learning more visible, and proposes the development of an accreditation framework to enhance professional standing and sustainability.
- The fourth part, Appendices contains the survey questions, accompanying data, limitations and recommendations for future research, with the hope the project will continue, to provide ongoing insight into our growing profession.

I gratefully acknowledge fellow Editorial Board member, Dr Julie Trafford (AUT), in preparing this special issue for publication.
